Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Ave Maria Of La Morte d Abel it is written: It unites three kinds of poetry - the epic, the tragic, and the pastoral. The characters are drawn with much regard to propriety, and the objection which some critics have offered - that he reminds us of Milton - may surely be turned into a compliment. He begins where Milton ends. With the rush of Paris divided by the Seine - over which, upon the beautiful bridges, black throngs were continually crossing and recrossing, - the swift boats threading the stream beneath me, and the roar of the great city booming in my ears, - I turned to The Death of Abel, Book I, and read: Henceforth repose in silence, thou soft pipe. No more I render thee vocal, no more I chant the simple manners of the rustic swain Fain would I raise my voice to bolder strains, and in harmonious lays rehearse the adventures of our primeval parents after their dreadful fall. Fain would I celebrate him, who, sacrificed by a brother s fury, his dust first mingled with the earth. Come, thou noble Enthusiasm, that warmest and fillest the mind of the rapt poet, who, during the silent hours of night, contemplates in the gloom of the thick grove, or at the side of the clear stream glimmering with the moon s pale lamp; when, seized by a divine transport, imagination takes her flight, and, with bold wing traversing the regions of created substances, penetrates into the distant empire of Possibilities, discovering with clear view the marvellous that captivates and the beautiful that enchants. Ah, Gessner, Gessner, you were right! What would...
