Not illustrated. 1913 Excerpt: . case with the hero; but in all that is really essential the true completion of Contarini, as of Vivian G-rey before it, and of Coningsby and Tancred later, is Disraeli s own career. On nearly every page of Contarini the reader who knows Disraeli will find him lifting the veil that hides his own personality. Sometimes in those smaller touches that reveal his tastes and habits: his unaffected joys in woods and trees-- I began to long to be a woodman, to pass a quiet, and contemplative, and virtuous life, amid the deep silence and beautiful scenery of forests ; his love of women s society-- For a long time, I could not detect the reason why I was so charmed with Egyptian life. At last I recollected that I had recurred, after a long estrangement, to the cheerful influence of women ; the incidents of composition-- After writing a book my mind always makes a great spring. I can write only in the morning. It is then I execute with facility all that I have planned the preceding eve. It is my habit to contrive in my head the complete work before I have recourse to the pen which is to execute it. I do not think that meditation can be too long, or execution too rapid. Or in the Polonius-like advice of Baron Fleming to his son, Read French authors. Read Rochefoucauld. The French writers are the finest in the world, for they...
