Not illustrated. 1830 Excerpt: . . . pavosky, or the fourwheeled post car without springs, the three horses driven by a rough isvostchick in his red checked shirt, who whooped and hallood to us loudly to keep out of the way; and it was not long before the sharp ring of the bell suspended to the bow on the collar of the centre horse died away in the distance. At the trackteers and post-houses the servants and unemployed isvostchicks might be seen lying about at night on the steps of the door and in the passages, in their sheep-skin shoobs: a pig would occasionally occupy a birth near them; and a hen come and perch on their nose. Never did I see people so indifferent to wherethey slept at night as the Russian mooziks (peasants); but the higher orders, too, care little about beds, and, when they arrive at an inn at night,...
