For this reason the co-operation of physician and surgeon in the preparation of this small work requires no justification. The aim of the authors has been primarily to assist the general practitioner in identifying a lesion from the symptoms which are present. Only such pathological details are included as can be strictly regarded as essential to this end; and whilst elementary clinical pathology has not been neglected, only the barest reference has been made to those methods of investigation which demand the resources of a well-equipped laboratory and the technical skill of an experienced pathologist. It has been thought unnecessary to elaborate certain methods of treatment, which only a surgical specialist could adequately undertake, but a more detailed description has been given of measures which are regarded as urgent, and which a practitioner would consider to come legitimately within his province.
